

My Dreamy Old Husband

Chapter 718

Even though no one saw her being splashed with water by Sophia, many were there back in the days when Sophia yelled at her. There were also video recordings of it.

After the Twitter post was made, the incident where Sophia pushed Irene down the stairs instantly made the headlines. In no time, many on the Internet started condemning Sophia.

This gave the two artists who were secretly married a break. The ball was now in Irene's hand, and news began spreading like wildfire.

Sophia, who had been keeping quiet, finally responded. She responded by posting a few arrogant words on her Twitter: 'Call the police if you dare then!'

These words were automatically interpreted by many as: 'I wanted to kill you—so what? I have people backing me up. If you want, go ahead and call the police!'

She's so arrogant and ferocious. How can she be so arrogant after hurting someone? This is absolute lawlessness!

Many fans became enraged by the post right away and could not take their eyes off this matter.

Irene never intended to go to the police about it as she was feeling guilty.

The discreet place where the incident happened was handpicked by her so that no third party would be able to testify against and for any of them.

There was nobody in that emergency passage, nor were there any surveillance cameras. However, many in the hospital hallway saw Sophia when she surreptitiously followed Irene.

If investigations were to be carried out, it would just be her words against Sophia's; no one else could testify and prove anything.

Before this, Irene never dared to bring this matter up to the police for fear of being investigated. She merely wanted to create a ruckus out of the situation and cause a fight between Michael and Sophia. Little did she know that not only was Sophia unresponsive toward her allegations, but Michael was also suspicious about what happened.

Feeling nervous, Irene felt that her efforts had gone to waste as none of her goals were materialized. Under the instigation of public opinion and her confidence over the number of fans she had, she took the risk and went to make a police report.

Soon enough, reporters took and published pictures of Irene showing up at a police station with her assistant to make a police report. The police station accepted the statement, began the investigation, and updated the public on the progress of the investigation via their official website.

Public opinion appeared to be in support of Irene. *Finally, Sophia, that heartless b*tch, is going to be arrested. Irene, the brave, fragile lady has finally sought revenge. Now that things are heated up, Sophia, the cruel supporting actress, will be put behind bars.*

Some even took the opportunity to examine how many years Sophia would have to be in prison. Based on the injury assessment report, Sophia may either be sentenced to a maximum of three years of imprisonment or be placed under police surveillance.

Reading all the Twitter posts that seemed logical and well-founded, Irene was overjoyed.

As long as Sophia can be put behind bars, my opportunity will come. Even if she doesn't end up in prison, Michael would still be utterly disappointed in her.

All of a sudden, an unfamiliar number called Irene. Upon answering it, Irene heard an angry voice yelling, "How dare you report it to the police? Do you want your life to end?"

Irene knew who this person was: it was the person who had been helping her out but decided to withdraw halfway through.

Irene responded conceitedly, "You useless pig. What else should I have done?"

Not saying anything, that person hung up.

Irene had been monitoring the news for the past couple of days. At the same time, she had also been waiting for Sophia to call. However, neither Sophia nor Michael called. Only Old Man Fletcher called several times to check on how things were while persuading her to withdraw the police report.

We're family. Things shouldn't get so ugly. But, Irene was still determined to make a ruckus.

While Irene was eagerly waiting for Sophia to be arrested, Michael posted a video clip on his various social media accounts. This was unlike Michael, who was never involved in any of these dramas.

The first scene of the video clip was the busy hospital hallway. It was the day Sophia allegedly pushed Irene down the stairs.

The back of a woman in a patient's gown was facing the camera. As the woman turned around, Irene's face appeared.

After turning around and sweeping a glance, she surreptitiously opened the door to the emergency passage and went in by herself.

A few minutes later, Sophia, in her patient's gown, went in too. At this point, the camera zoomed in as if someone was controlling the camera. Sophia then opened the door and let the person holding the camera follow from behind.

Throughout the entire video clip, Sophia was in sight and would occasionally turn around.

Later in the recording, the person recording turned on the night mode on the video camera after realizing that they were in a dark and bleak stairway. As such, the video was still clear. After just a couple of seconds, Sophia heard a series of thuds and immediately began running toward it, followed by the person holding the camera. Shortly after that, the video displayed the scene where Irene was bleeding and lying on the ground in her patient's gown.

"Oh my God!" Sophia yelled and ran out to look for help.

The next scene went back to the hospital hallway where Sophia was calling a doctor to come and rescue Irene. The last scene of the video clip was where Sophia nervously followed behind the crowd.

The video clip was of high resolution, so every face in that video clip was visible and discernible. In addition, the entire video clip was time-stamped, from the scene where Irene entered through the door to Sophia doing the same, and it was unedited.

After paying close attention to the video, one could notice in the surveillance clip of the hallway that there was a quick and energetic robot following Sophia.

That's Nicholas! Sophia mentions him a lot in her Twitter posts. The robot followed Sophia around and recorded the entire process!

Based on the contents of the video clip, Sophia did not push Irene down the stairs; instead, Irene fell down the stairs herself. The truth finally came to light! Sophia was framed!

Irene's jaw dropped when she finished watching the video clip.

I didn't even notice that Sophia had a robot following her around. Alas, that robot can even record videos! What should I do now?

Desperate, Irene quickly deleted all her accusatory Twitter posts that could be used as evidence before she dialed her assistant with her trembling fingers. She wanted her assistant to post a Twitter post in her stead, saying: 'Irene Webber fell and bumped her head, so she could not remember clearly what happened that time and thought that Sophia pushed her. We're truly sorry, everyone.'

Good thing that I really bumped my head because of how dark it was. It's sensible to say that I couldn't clearly remember if I fell off the stairs myself or someone pushed me. I suppose there's still room for maneuver.

Following that, Irene quickly withdrew her police report and sent out some Twitter posts begging for sympathy, stating how severe her condition was after bumping her head and that no one cared about her. She continued by saying that she had mistakenly accused Sophia and she was sorry.

Perhaps, as time goes by, people will forget this incident.

Much to her surprise, Taylor posted another video clip on Twitter after a couple of hours. The video clip was recorded on the day of the product launch for Sophia's pet luxury goods brand. In a quiet and empty corner, Sophia and Irene were seen talking to each other. The content of their conversation was not made available, but Irene looked sorrowful as she begged Sophia, who was sitting right opposite her drinking a glass of water. Throughout the whole conversation, Sophia looked composed and calm.

All of a sudden, the sorrowful Irene snatched the glass from Sophia and splashed the water in the glass onto her face. When she did it, the camera clearly captured the ferocious yet happy grin on her face...